Fuelling Research and Hope for Young Cancer Patients Like Ellie

"When you're 31 years old and you're telling your family and friends, 'I have breast cancer', it's bizarre".

Just a few days after her 31st birthday, and seven days before she and her husband were scheduled to fly to Europe, Ellie received the devastating diagnosis of Triple Negative Breast Cancer (TNBC).

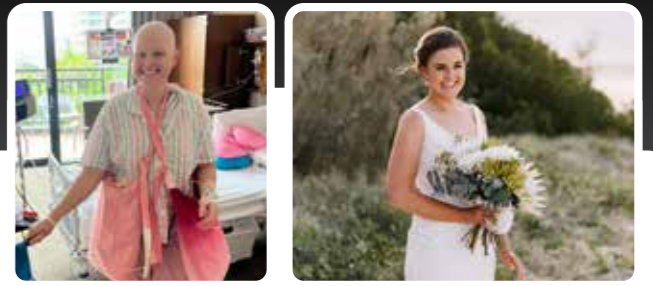

Ellie was keeping an eye on a lump she found in her left breast by complete accident, and after three weeks decided to get it checked. Ellie lived a fit and healthy lifestyle, so an aggressive breast cancer diagnosis came as a complete shock.

"When I heard those words, I just thought, 'no, this isn't happening to me'."

Genetic testing revealed Ellie had inherited a mutation in the BRCA1 gene, meaning her risk of developing breast cancer and other cancers was markedly increased. The next week was a whirlwind of meetings with surgeons, planning for chemotherapy, cancelling travel plans, and what was most daunting of all—thinking about her family planning and how she could best safeguard the future of her family.

After six months of intensive chemotherapy, Ellie decided to have a double mastectomy.

"That was a really hard decision for me. But anxiety of having the breast cancer come back just wasn't worth it for our family."

"Younger women with breast cancer face some unique challenges around their treatment. The sort of research that we're doing now holds great hope for the younger generation in their twenties and thirties if they're in a risk category."
- Dr Jodi Saunus, Senior Research Fellow at Mater Research

"I never thought this would happen to me, let alone at such a young age. If you have a family history, get tested. You are never too young to start checking your breasts," Ellie advocates.

When you purchase a Mater Cars for Cancer ticket, you are joining the global effort to change the future of cancer diagnoses, treatment and care for people like Ellie. Thank you.
