Your support is fuelling cancer research

20,428 Australian women will be diagnosed with breast cancer this year.* Today, more than 55 women will hear the words "You have breast cancer" and eight women—mothers, daughters, sisters and friends—will tragically lose their fight against the disease.*

Breast cancer isn't just one disease, there are different types and subtypes, which grow at different rates and can be diagnosed at different stages.

No two women are the same and nor are their breast cancer journeys. However, many will find they have one thing in common—that their breast cancer is invasive, with the potential to spread to other areas of the body.

Triple-negative breast cancer (TNBC) is an invasive and often aggressive type of breast cancer that tends to occur in women younger than 40. TNBC grows and spreads fast, is more inclined to metastasise, and can be highly resistant to chemotherapy.

Dr Jodi Saunus and her colleagues at Mater Research are homing in on TNBC, trying to unlock new diagnostics for at-risk patients, and working towards the development of new treatment pathways.

"Because our team spans across breast cancer research, clinical care and bioinformatics, we are in an incredible position to do this work," Dr Saunus said.

Dr Saunus and her team are working with Mater patients to gather and compare different types of breast tissue, as part of an ambitious new project to decode a range of mysteries about breast cancer susceptibility and chemotherapy response.

"This study is allowing us to dive deeper into the epigenomics of human breast tumours than ever before, so the chances of discovering entirely new information about breast cancer are very high."
- Dr. Jodi Saunus

Epigenomics is an emerging field in biomedical research that focuses on understanding how, and when, different parts of the genome are engaged in different cell types of the body, including tumour cells.

This innovative project has exciting potential to impact the way TNBC is managed, including the development of new drugs that make tumours more sensitive to chemotherapy," Dr Saunus said.

THANK YOU. Your support of Cars for Cancer enables researchers like Dr Jodi Saunus to conduct this vital cancer research, and provides hope for a future where alternative treatments with proven efficacy become available here in Australia, and across the globe.

You are helping to change lives with every ticket that you buy, and it might just change your life too! Thank you for your support.
